As their name suggests, the Portuguese water dog breed originated from Portugal. They are known for their compatibility with the ocean, helping fishers lure fish into the net, and retrieving hooks and fishing equipment from the waters. The upside to having one of these dog breeds is that they do not shed often. Even though they have lots of fur, they seem to have minimal risks to a person allergic to dog's fur. Regardless, it is important for these breeds to be groomed else they can easily develop skin irritation. If these breeds are not groomed frequently, their hair can grow instantaneously and easily tangle up. For instance, the hair around the eyes can overshoot and block the dog's eyesight. And without immediate action, this overgrowth can lead to impaired vision. You wouldn't want that now, would you? You can get a Portuguese water dog for as low as $2,000 and as high as $12,000 or more.
